

ABSTRACT :

This paper will look at how social movements, such as the Occupy collectives and 'Get Up!' firmly believe in sustainability, renewable energy and a reduction in consumption for the betterment of the planet. Many activists believe that climate change, depletion of natural resources, including fossil fuels, is a consequence of unsustainable industrialisation, and should change. The paper will explore why sustainability and resilience is at the forefront of social movement principles.

The following slides are a series of images that reflect the themes in the presentation.

THE REAL JULIA

The consequence of a high-carbon consuming society, will eventually, 'kill itself as a result of the hostile environment it will create – hundreds of millions displaced. Likely consequences are extended, severe and global conflicts. It is not a credible medium-term option for growth' (Stern, 2011).
